Chewed up by a Whale. BY N. P. WILLIS.

most interesting acquaintance at 'Sconset, was tacket "skipper," who had once been chewed to whale—his surviving to tell the story, of hing simply because the dainty leviathan, hing the taste of him, had dropped the unwilling hful out again upon the clean table-cloth of the This was forty years ago; and it is a rare ace, you will allow, of a morsel's proving pleasompany so long after being rejected by a reluctionach at sea.

bould ask pardon, however, for speaking thus arly of one of the best specimens of manhood have ever had the happiness to meet—a seam now in his seventy-third year, as tall, straight, ous and cheerful, at this advanced age, as when tizens of New Bedford, at present, and enjoying ifortable independence from the capture of the that wouldn't eat him and of other whales who arly left him unswallowed. But I must give be particulars of the half-mast-ication of Capt. iner—who, by the way, in addition to his singuraperience as a mouthful, has the peculiarity of the son of the first white male child born on wiy arrived at the honors of Captaincy, our Nan-at skipper was cruising along the coast of South rica—just off Peru—when there was a cry from mast-head—" a whale ho!" The direction was at, the sails trimmed for the overtaking of the er, and, when within a mile, the boats were red, each with its crew of six.

ietly affoat lay the amphibious Shylock of the the swift boat came within harpooning dis-the inevitable iron, hurled by that strong arm, ed to his vitals. Not as usual, however, did ack monster dive out of sight; but turning, ting straight for his enemies, he rolled over e bulk to get a fairer grip, and brought his together upon the boat's prove—the forward half at slight structure, Captain and I, disappearing be best part of an apple tart in the munch of a col-boy. The remainder of the crew, the and four oarsmen, had jumped overboard; e whale, with another roll, dived down to eight, he threw up the unswallowed Cap-relief-boat pulling instantly to the spot and crushed morsel and the five swimmers the chewed-up right hand of the Captain, as me at table, which had first excited my cumulating the inquiries which drew from last, this thrilling story)—the stump, old as visible below the coat-sleeve, looking like a rope's end, but still retaining clutch enough the chowder-spoon to his mouth. Four of all, a second breaking his collar-bone, a third ing his arm, and the fourth crushing his hand remainder of his body being simply squeezed jelly. The healing of the wound in the head cavity like the inside of an egg-shell; and, bugh the hair has grown over it, (hair still brown and thick, with the stubborn vitality of the un-kill-ble Nantucketer.) it tells, after forty years, the size the tooth that did it. I laid the ends of my three ngers very comfortably in the hollow. But the after-history of this perilous adventure as to me the most remarkable part of it. With a and the ship lying becalmed in mid-ocean—six days' mil from any port, even with a fair wind—how was this crushed and mangled sufferer to be doctored and

Capt. Gardiner, providentially, though so nearly eaten up, retained full possession of his senses. His first mate was young, but a very smart lad, and possessed fortunately, of Yankee aptitude—good at everything; and with the aid of the sufferer's directions, he thing; and with the aid of the sufferer's directions, he did the work of a surgeon. The Captain ordered him first to make splints, and then to set his broken arm—the collar-bone being left to heal itself, unset, (as it remains, to this day, without perceptibly affecting his erect shape or the action of his chest,) and the other wounds being bandaged in the usual way. He was then laid on the cabin floor, and, with fans made of the leaves of the log-book, he was kept as cool as was any way possible—for it was the bettest of South was any way possible—for it was the hottest of South Sea weather. Feeling, however, that his life depended on the exercise of his strong will, he gave orders that he should, by no possibility, be allowed to sleep over five minutes at a time. And, with this vigilant watch kept up for six days, the ship, (navigated by his directions, as he lay on the cabin floor,) entered the port of Peru.

A boat sent immediately on shore, brought off the Emperor's physician, who, on looking at the prostrate man and examining his wounds, advised only that they should send for a confessor. Other prescription, the medical man thought, would be useless, as death was evidently so close at hand. But the Captain was of a different opinion. "A physican for the soul is very well at proper time and place," aid he; "but, at present, I want one for the body—and I happen to know of one who will cure me!"

It so happened, that—in a previous touch at that

It so happened, that—in a previous touch at that same port—Capt. Gardiner had heard of he sick mate of an American vessel who had been left chind by his shipmates, and to whom, as a charity to suffering countryman, he then offered a passage home.
The man's message of reply was, that he fortunated stood in no need of the kindness, as he was under the care of a Spanish doctor who lived at Pura, (a village back in the mountains,) and who had taken him to his house and treated him like his own child. And, for this kind old doctor, Capt. Gardiner now sent, with all convenient haste—dispensing at once, with any further attendance by the physician of the Em-

Early on the second morning arrived the "good Samaritan," and there was comfort in his first look and encouragement in his first words. He could cure the crushed man if he only had him at his house in the mountains. But, how to get him there? There the mountains. But, how to get him there? There was no road—only a mule path, along the edges of precipices, climbing wild cliffs and scrambling through tangled ravines—forty miles of footpath, penetrating the depths of a wilderness.

But the Captain's Yankee ingenuity seconded the goo! will of the doctor. He constructed a new vehicle, as he lay, (in the other physician's opinion,) dying on the floor. A couple of long lithe spars were brought, by his orders, and a hammock was rigged to swing suspended from the center. His friend had two mules, and with the spars fastened to their sides, they were to walk, like the bearers of a palanquin, one before, the other behind him—a tandem hammock in which he could ride, he was sure, quite as mock in which he could ride, he was sure, quite as mock in which he could ride, he was sure, quite as comfortably as men could carry him.

And, of the the two days' journey which he thus made over the mountains, Capt. Gardiner's description was one of glowing remembrance. By the elasticity of the spars which supported him, he was borne without jolting; and, part of the time, he slept most refreshingly. But the path was a giddy one, to a sailor's eye—along the edges of cliffs where a single false step would have dashed him and his mules "into grease-pots." and now and then turning where "into grease-pots," and now and then turning where his two spars formed a bridge from mule to mule, over a chasm—hundreds of feet of jagged rocks nearly perpendicular, stretching away below, (he still thrill-ingly remembers,) as he looked occasionally over the ingly remembers,) as he looked occasionally over the side of his mattress.

They arrived safely at the mountain home of the old Spaniard, however; and, here, all was comfort and kind care. They only differed on one point. The doctor thought the broken collar-bone should still be set; but the Captain resisted. He had felt the broken ends knit where they were, he said, and Nature's mending would do for him. And he was right; for, after forty years, he opened his shirt bosom and showed me the ridgy projection of the broken bone, strong and healthy, and doing as good service as a whole one, that very day at 'Sconset.

It took six weeks of kind nursing to put him on his legs again; and then with a grateful farewell to the kind old doctor of Pura, Capt. Gardiner returned to his ship—taking command, and once more pursuing the object of his voyage. And, soon harpooning the requisite number of unsuspecting whales (who for a lack of a newspaper, had not the slightest idea, probably, that it was the very same man whom one of their number had chewed up, boat and all, three mouths before!) he returned prosperously home.

For an instance of indomitable energy, this can hardly be outdone, I should think; and, to see the erect, noble-looking and hearty old man of seventy-three, as I saw him, an hour or two ago—walking home to his dinner, with a light step and a good appetite, in New Bedford, forty years after being eaten up by a whale in the South Sea—is to get a fine idea of the stuff of a Nantucket whaleman!

To the Farmer and Bealers in Agricultural Implements.

PLEASE R. E.A.D.—Having creeted a good shep, with facilities not heretofore possessed by any in this little for manufacturing Agricultural Implements, I beg feave to assessment that I am now properly under way with that business. I employ none but the best and most experienced mechanics, and work no material but the best. In this way I hope to promote the interest of the good mechanic, the interest of the farmer, the interest of our young and growing Agricultural State, and at the same time that interest which is foremost with all mankind—self. I have had twenty years' experience in the manufacturing business; I established the first steel plow in the State of Wiscomin, in the dawn of her day of great agricultural improvement. I also made the first Reaping and Howing machine, and the first steel plow ever made in this State. Therefore, with my experience and a knowledge of the wasts of the country, (which are different from most others.) I sed confident that I can and will do much for the interest of the wasts of the country; and in my efforts I trust I shall most with a good share of patronage from the farmer, and all interested in this matter, and in the interest and development of the agricultural improvement of our State. I design, and have under way, the manufacturing of
